Liquidation was noticeable in railroad issues and the financial district is still in the dark as to what measures will be adopted to take care of the pressing unancial requirements of the various companies. The possibility is looming up that railroads will be turned back to their owners within the next month or so, unless satisfactory gatfroud financing measures are found, and such a development would not be to the liking of Wall Street. The burden of financing the companies would then be thrown entirely on private bankers, with each read left to take care of itself. It is pretty certain that the cost of new money to various companies would be unusually high. Meantime, orders for new equipment and materials to be used in betternent and improvement work would be indefinitely held up.
